

TwentyNineInches.com

December 16, 2012

Final Review

Featuring: Raptor 10

Monthly Traffic: 5,142

URL: <http://tinyurl.com/c45m8lr>

With plenty of rides wearing the Osprey Raptor 10 under my belt, I can now give you my final take on this redesigned pack from the Raptor line up.

Okay, let's cut to the chase here- I really was a big fan of the older Raptor 10 that I had been using for several years. I had no interest in checking out other packs for quite a while there, but after using this new version of the Raptor 10, I cannot see myself ever using the old one again!

The new version's details, which I covered in the previous posts, takes this model and raises it to the next level. The useable hip pockets, the Tool Roll, and the way I can lay the main compartment open are all big reasons why I like this pack. I find things in a much faster, less fiddly manner and the pack does a great job of holding everything I need for day rides. I really like the white inner color of the main compartment, since things I am looking for are easier for me to see against that backdrop.

As for the bladder, I am liking it for the most part. Osprey did tweak the opening to the hydration bladder which makes getting the bladder out, filled, and returned into the pack much easier than with the old Raptor 10. The bladder on the newest Raptor 10 is also easily filled completely. The old one could be a bit difficult to fill up all the way.

The Raptor 10 is comfortable to wear, and it has a wider range of adjustment than the previous model. I liked the way the old one felt, but Osprey has made this one even better.

I am very impressed with Osprey's latest effort here. If a 10 liter pack size works for you, I would highly recommend this one as a great choice to look at.