

Wired.com

April 30, 2015

The Gadgets and Gear We Couldn't Get Enough of This Month

Featuring: Atmos AG 65

Monthly Traffic: 22,159,400

URL: <http://tinyurl.com/pn5sn6w>

THE GADGETS AND GEAR WE COULDN'T GET ENOUGH OF THIS MONTH

ONE OF THE best parts of our jobs here at WIRED is that we get to test all the new things as soon as they come out. But we often only get a few days to play with something before having to write about it. That can be difficult—getting a clear assessment of an object's worth when you have to crank out a written review in less than a week. Some products only show their true colors after several weeks, months, or years to experience them, live with them, play with them, and wear them. That's what we've gathered here—products we've been testing and love, or the stuff from our lives that we own and never want to let go. This is the gear we want to take everywhere. This is the stuff we want to cook breakfast for. These are the things we love.

3 / 10

This Osprey Atmos AG 65 ($260) is the most comfortable trekking backpack I've ever worn. The reason? It uses a new suspension system that ditches traditional plastic and foam for mesh webbing. The webbing, which stretches from your shoulder blades to the hip belt, is more pliable and immediately conforms to the shape of your body. The design drastically improves load carry, venting, and overall comfort.—Jakob Schiller  WIRED

